1. THE VARIABILITY OF THE SCIENTIFIC SIGNATURE

The lack of uniformity in the signature by the authors and the concordance of common surnames harms the location of the investigations and can interfere with the citation indexes of articles (citation index) and authors.

In addition, these indicators are increasingly used in different evaluation processes such as professional career or research funding.

2. WHAT IS ORCID? www.orcid.org

Open Researcher and Contributor ID (ORCID) is a non-profit organization that has developed a unique identifier for authors of scientific papers.

This identifier guarantees the unequivocal distinction of the scientific production of researchers, different systems and links the research activities referenced in information.

ORCID is based on the ISO 2279:21012 standard (information and Documentation international Standard Name identifier).

It is a permanent 16-digit code that uniquely identifies. It is important to check if you are registered so that the same person does not have several ORCID's assigned with different signatures.

In the case of having possible variants of the personal name with which an author can be referenced in the different information systems, it is good that they are also registered. In the case of wanting to introduce more than one variant form, it must be separated with a semicolon.
